Greenhill Transition

Changes in Lane County and Eugene animal control

On July 1st, Greenhill Humane Society began providing sheltering and adoption activities at the former Lane County Animal Services facility. Greenhill now operates two facilities in Eugene – one on Green Hill Road and one on West 1st Avenue. Also on July 1, the city of Eugene took responsibility for animal enforcement and dog licensing inside the Eugene city limits.

What does this mean for pet owners? If you live outside the Eugene city limits, or in unincorporated Eugene, you will probably experience no changes. Lane County Animal Services still provides animal enforcement and licensing to unincorporated Lane County. The phone number to contact Lane County's Animal Control Officer remains the same (682-3645). Springfield has not changed its animal control services, nor have any of the other cities within the county. Dog licensing for these areas also remains the same.

For Eugene residents, there are two city of Eugene Animal Welfare Officers providing service seven days a week. The Eugene Animal Services direct line for reporting lost and found pets, dogs at large and animal abuse, as well as obtaining additional information, is 687-4060. The city of Eugene is now issuing its own dog licenses. However, Lane County licenses issued to Eugene dogs prior to July 1 will remain valid for the term of the license. When the Lane County dog license expires, owners will need to purchase a city of Eugene license. City of Eugene licenses can be purchased in person at the 1st Avenue Shelter or on-line at <http://wkly.ws/1bs>

If you have lost a pet anywhere in Lane County, including the city of Eugene, check the 1st Avenue Shelter. The phone number for the shelter is 844-1777. Animals in the shelter are viewable on-line at www.green-hill.org

What does this mean for stray, abandoned, abused and neglected pets? Stray and impounded animals will continue to be cared for at the 1st Avenue Shelter, and repeat visitors may recognize some familiar faces – Greenhill now employs several of the former LCAS employees. Greenhill is committed to providing a high level of care, both for the stray, abandoned, abused and neglected pets at the 1st Avenue Shelter, as well as the owned and transferred pets at the shelter on Green Hill Road. Animals are never euthanized because of space limitations. Greenhill euthanizes only in situations involving animals that cannot be safely handled – either because of aggression or contagious disease, or where the animal is suffering and a reasonable level of treatment would not be effective at improving quality of life. Greenhill employs a shelter veterinarian and trained animal care staff who evaluate and provide treatment and care for each animal.

Additionally, Greenhill's Animal Care Committee, which includes staff and professional veterinary volunteers, meets monthly to discuss animal care practices in an effort to ensure that the organization is always striving to improve the level of care provided to homeless pets.

How do I volunteer or donate to help homeless, stray, abandoned, abused, and neglected animals? Donations and volunteers are needed now, more than ever, for the activities at both shelters. For information about volunteering at the shelters, call 844-1777 or 689-1503, or visit www.green-hill.org and click on "Volunteer."

Donations can be made by phone, on-line at www.green-hill.org / donate, or by mail sent to 1st Avenue Shelter, 3970 W. 1st Ave. Eugene 97402 or Greenhill Humane Society, 88530 Green Hill Road, Eugene 97402. Checks can be made to Greenhill Humane Society or 1st Avenue Shelter. Donors can dedicate their gifts specifically to the activity of sheltering stray, abused and neglected animals, to the Mend-a-Friend fund, which is used for providing life-saving medical treatments, or to the general fund that supports on-going operations at both shelters.

Where do I go to adopt a new pet? Although the primary goal at the 1st Avenue Shelter is reuniting stray animals with their owners, both shelters have animals awaiting adoption into new loving homes. All animals available in both shelters can be viewed at www.green-hill.org.

Cary Lieberman is executive director of Greenhill Humane Society. If you have questions about animal welfare services in your neighborhood, call 844-1777 or 689-1503 for more information.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

STERILE VISION FOR 4J

I am deeply grateful for Mark Gillem's recent analysis [cover story 7/19] of the flaws in the proposed 4J Facilities Master Plan. He did not say it, but I will: The emperor has no clothes. Bigger is not better. Newer is not better. More expensive is not better. At one time, the South Eugene region contained Dunn, Fox Hollow, Laurel Hill, Whiteaker, Parker and Condon Schools in addition to Harris, Edison and Edgewood. Within the memory of many residents is also the Glenwood neighborhood school.

The proposed Master Plan would reduce what once were nine schools into two. After almost 40 years of rejecting simplistic solutions in favor of a nuanced, complex and diverse combination of homegrown neighborhood, alternative and charter schools, I cannot imagine that the voters of Eugene or the patrons of 4J will embrace this sterile vision of our city's future. Speaking for myself, as a parent, taxpayer, educator and homeowner, I will vote "no" for the first time in my life on the upcoming bond levy that proposes closing and combining more schools in our community. I feel certain that I will not be alone in that choice.

Mary Bauer
Eugene

PUBLIC SAFETY BLACKMAIL

Springfield and Lane County love to use the fear of jail closures to promote property tax increases. Why not have a graduated property tax like the income tax, only skewed toward an equal burden not in favor of downtown developers, the timber moguls, etc.? A sales tax inherently puts the burden on the poor because it takes a larger percentage of their net worth than the rich.

Vince Loving

STARTING A CONVERSATION

Eugene has a proud history of great schools with community support. The district is in the early stages of developing a comprehensive facilities plan that will help continue this history. [See cover story "Which Way, 4J?" last week.]

Most of Eugene's school buildings are 50 years old or older and some are in marginal condition. The district has maintained these buildings well, but many of these buildings were not optimally designed or constructed. Most were also built at a time when educational, energy efficiency, and technological expectations were dramatically different than they are today.

In developing a plan, the district's educational vision includes school buildings that support learning, appealing programs in all four regions of the district, and efficient use of resources. Maintenance of strong neighborhood schools and consistency with educational best practices will also be guiding principles.

The facilities study prepared for 4J builds upon the facility plan developed in 2002 that had wide community input and provides an analysis of the condition of our buildings and a possible district configuration. This initial proposal is intended as a starting place for the community discussion, not the ending place. Any discussion will need to include careful analysis of whether to remodel or rebuild schools.

The School Board will hold its first work session about the facilities plan Sept. 12. The board's initial discussion will require the board to decide what plan to forward for input.

My hope is that community conversation will result in a plan that the community supports and serves all our children well.

Jennifer Geller
Chair, 4J School Board

EARTH WITHOUT US

Re: "Death to Oysters" [Letters, 7/19]: I am all in for global warming and don't deny it in the least. I believe we should keep up on overfishing, industrialization, clear cutting and burning copious amounts of fossil fuels and coal to put a large cloud over the world. The quicker we kill ourselves off, the better. Then we could allow the Earth to live and thrive as it once has in its true state: human-less.

Chris Maher

TITLE TO CAPSTONE

This [7/12 EW] article states that Capstone is going to start a proposed project without having title to all of the land. Looks as if bumps are starting to happen.

Capstone has a local history that is less than sterling. University Commons apartment buildings west of Garden Way and just south of I-105 is an example.

Due diligence by the city of Eugene planning/permitting department among other responsible government, private and business interests could have figured this out.

Eugene does not have to hop on the first turnip truck to come along. If it is a good location someone with capital, vision and maybe integrity will show up.

Also, what sort of long-range management agreement is part of this mix? University Commons has had more than its share of problems.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN DEXTER

I attended the July 12 land use hearing on Lost Creek Rock Products' mining of Parvin butte. For nearly three hours, neighbors of the Butte offered compelling, often heartbreaking testimony about the impacts the mining has already had on their lives, and the much greater impact the mining and transport of Parvin Butte rock would have over the next 20 years.

At stake is the health and wellbeing, the economic and even physical survival, of a large number of Dexter residents — not to mention the viability of salmon and other wildlife in the area. Not only livelihoods, but lives may be destroyed if the blasting and transport of Parvin butte are allowed to continue.

Multiple neighbors of the Butte testified that they had moved to Dexter specifically because they not only wanted, but needed, a quiet area in which to live, having suffered noise-related trauma and hearing loss that make living in close proximity to active blasting not only an annoyance, but literally a health- and life-threatening proposition. A nearby home houses 11 Vietnam-era veterans suffering from PTSD; those men have been re-traumatized by recent blasting. Another resident with an already-compromised immune system suffered major health setbacks as a result of the April 10 blasting, and needed to testify in absentia. Add dust from the gravel mining into the equation, and the health threats are even greater.

Residents' animals, crops and home businesses are all endangered by the mining. One massage therapist needed to cancel a week's worth of appointments because of mining operations earlier this year. Many of the mine's neighbors have put their life savings into their homes and properties there, believing they'd be able to work from home, support themselves and age healthily there. These plans are now on hold.

Testimony also made it clear that the transport of the rock (one large gravel truck every five minutes, 11 hours a day, six days a week, for 20 years) over the already dangerous Rattlesnake Road (with its blind curves, blind pullouts, frequently stopping vehicles and no shoulder) is a recipe for traffic deaths.

The plan to mine Parvin Butte violates basic human rights — the rights of Dexter residents to health, to safety, to the pursuit of their livelihoods. Only a heartless system of governance would allow this plan to continue. If the codes are poorly written, rewrite them. Meanwhile, when lives are at stake, the code should be simple: Protect them.

Chris Roth

WHO PAYS FOR BEAR TRAPPING?

Lane County has called in the USDA's controversial Wildlife Services to trap a bear out of its Rattlesnake Road waste disposal site. But Brooks Fahy of Predator Defense questions why Lane County is spending the money to trap a bear when it's letting criminals out of its jail.

Oregon has an estimated 25,000 to 30,000 black bears according to the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife, and bears showing up around human habitation is not uncommon.

Bears are attracted to food, pet food, fruit and garbage, according to ODFW, and that's something dumps have in abundance. Fahy says there have been reports of holes in the fence around the dump and asks, rather than trap the bear, "Why aren't they fixing the fence line?" and adds, "This is a dump. We all know we have to secure the facilities."

Jeff Bishop, waste management superintendent, says that breaches in site fences are repaired as they are reported, "which at some sites is pretty frequently."

Fahy says after Wildlife Services live traps a bear, it is usually killed. Predator Defense has sought to end federal funding of Wildlife Services. Fahy cites a recent investigation by the Sacramento Bee that revealed that using traps, snares and poison, Wildlife Services employees "have accidentally killed more than 50,000 animals since 2000 that were not problems, including federally protected golden and bald eagles; more than 1,100 dogs, including family pets; and several species considered rare or imperiled by wildlife biologists."

Congressman Peter DeFazio has called for cutting federal funding to Wildlife Services.

Lane County voted not to renew its contract with Wildlife Services in 2005, according to Predator Defense, but Bishop says as a condition of the disposal sites' operating permits measures must be in place for issues such as "birds, rodents and other vectors." Bishop says waste management does contract with Wildlife Services for things like bear activity. The funding comes from the Solid Waste Fund, which is generated by user fees, he says.

A child captures a bunny at the Cottage Grove animal scramble

CRUEL RABBIT ROUNDUP

Bunnies being dumped out of a trailer, a rabbit being flung through the air and rows of screaming children bearing down on a cluster of bunnies paralyzed with fear: Red Barn Rabbit Rescue documented this and more at the "animal scramble" at the July 13-14 Cottage Grove Rodeo (see our blog post July 16). Animal advocates are seeking to put an end to this annual event that they say is cruel and irresponsible.

Rabbits are hardy but fragile, Heather Crippen of RBRR says. Crippen says that animal scrambles, basically contests in which if a person can chase down one of the animals, he keeps it, traditionally used farm animals such as sheep, goats and pigs to give farmers a way of starting herds and later as a way of giving 4-H kids the opportunity to raise an animal. But at some point Crippen says the Cottage Grove Rodeo event, which is put on by the Cottage Grove Riding Club, became focused on pet rabbits.

Crippen and her daughter Alex run the area's only strictly rabbit rescue out of their home in Creswell. It currently houses about 50 or so rabbits, and Crippen says events such as the animal scramble lead to more rabbits in need of adoption as the kids come home with pets they don't know how to care for or their parents didn't approve. She says 81 percent of rabbits will be homeless in their lifetime.

Scott Beckstead of the Oregon Humane Society says that rabbits are the third most popular companion animal in the U.S., "Yet this event teaches children that they amount to little more than a throwaway prize." Beckstead, Crippen and others are looking into ways to end events like the animal scramble in Lane County.

Crippen is delighted the video her teenage daughter filmed, edited and posted on YouTube has created an outcry about the animal scramble. She says she tried to talk to the riding club about how cruel the event is to rabbits, but didn't get a reply. Crippen would like the riding club to research rabbits and learn how events like this affect the animals. "As an experienced rabbit person, I'm telling you that it's wrong," she says. She says stress is one of the leading causes of illness in rabbits.

Crippen points out that in the video the rabbits are in "fear paralysis" — frozen with their ears pointed forward — as they are dumped into the rodeo arena, where normally in open spaces they would frolic, and finally begin to flee when the children begin to grab them. She says that in the melee a rabbit could get injured by being grabbed by a leg, or the stress of the whole thing is enough to eventually kill a bunny, especially one in the hands of an inexperienced new owner.

Local animal advocates have started a petition against the event at wkly.ws/1bu and video can be seen at wkly.ws/1bv

RACCOONS ON THE LOOSE

If you want to prepare a raccoon before cooking it, consult the 1970s edition of Joy of Cooking, which says "remove all fat, inside and out," and then soak it in saltwater overnight in the refrigerator. But a more likely conundrum in Eugene these days might be: What if one bites you without being provoked?

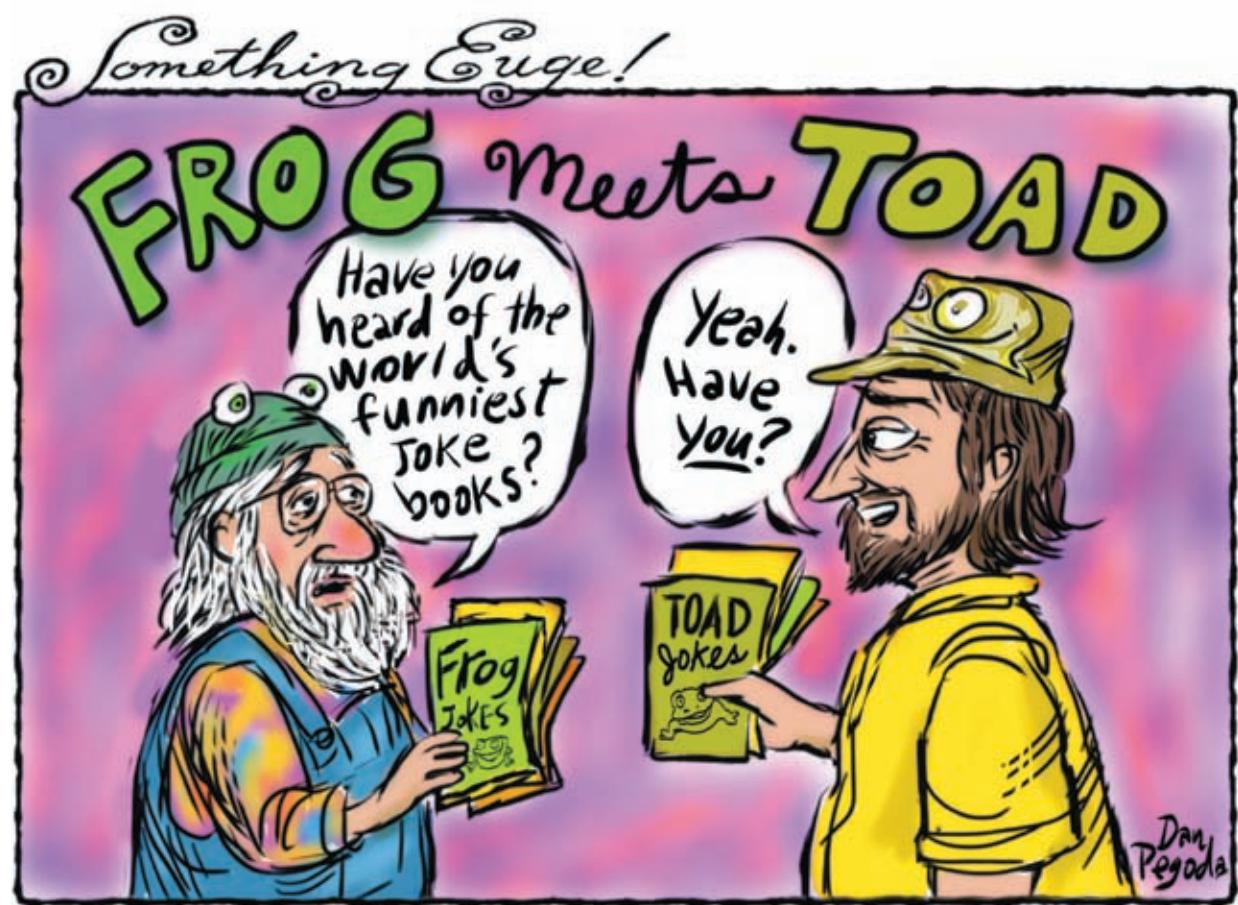

On July 16, Zondie Zinke and her partner Otis Haschemeyer were enjoying a nighttime stroll with their two young children and dog when multiple raccoons came out of the hedge and became very aggressive, scratching Zinke and going after Haschemeyer. Both of them were bit at least once, she says.

Although they had a dog with them and they were near garbage cans, the aggression didn't seem warranted. "I immediately thought rabies," she says. The couple cleaned their wounds and sought out their medical provider. They were told by their physician that it wouldn't be necessary to get rabies shots because of the unlikelihood of the raccoons they encountered carrying the disease.

According to a 2010 Oregon Department of Health report, bats are the most common carrier of rabies in the state, with an estimated 10 percent of the population infected. Although raccoons like any mammal can carry the disease, they are not often considered likely candidates. "Raccoon is not one I think of as being common with rabies," says Brian Wolfer, a wildlife biologist for Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife.

But Zinke wasn't reassured by her doctor. She did some internet research and found cases in some states where even though rabies hadn't shown up in raccoons for nearly 50 years, someone had contracted it from one recently.

Zinke and her partner went back and got the rabies shots. The doctor's hesitance to administer them was off-putting, she says. She believes it was much more difficult than it should have been for them to be treated, especially since if untreated, a person can die of the disease.

Lane County does not currently provide wildlife control services. In order for the raccoon(s) that bit Zinke and her partner to be confirmed carriers they would have to be caught and tested. Wolfer says that the raccoon would have to be caught right away to make sure it was the right one.

How the raccoon would be caught is a little unclear. The Lane County website suggests trapping it in a box and calling a service provider like ODFW, listed on the site. Live traps are available at many feed and home stores. According to Patrick Luedtke, Public Health Officer for Lane County Health and Human Services, calling the Communicable Disease Division of Oregon Department of Public Health might be a good step forward in finding out whether a bite might be from a rabies carrier.

• How will Councilor Betty Taylor vote when the West Eugene EmX Extension comes before the Eugene City Council this fall? We broke the news on our blog July 3 that Juan Carlos Valle, her opponent on the November ballot, has come out in favor of extending EmX, and we reported that Taylor was rumored to be leaning toward support as well. EW had asked both candidates to tell us where they stand on the issue. Taylor isn't holding a press conference, as Valle did, but she told us this week, "I have decided to vote for the 11th Avenue route, though I still have concerns for the affected businesses." And she still wishes "for more, smaller buses on more routes."

Taylor says she took a tour recently with LTD General Manager Ron Kilcoyne looking at housing on both sides of the proposed route. "I have decided that the bridges across Amazon Creek (which are part of the project) will make bus service more easily available to many people. Also this is probably the only way we are going to have 10-minute service, which is a huge incentive. I was thinking that a fast way to get to Target is not a desirable motive, but getting people to the library more easily is a laudable goal."

Anyone with doubts about EmX should pay attention to Taylor's careful decision. This retired educator with a Ph.D. really does her homework and knows the complex issues. Anything can happen right up to the vote, but at this point we hear George Brown is one of the two or three councilors who are still undecided. Mayor Piercy, a strong supporter of EmX, could be the tie-breaker.

Sounds like she's going traveling overseas for nine months in the fall. "Marion has had an amazing and influential career as a community organizer for many of the issues for which we all deeply care," says CALC Executive Director Kori Rodley in the latest newsletter. ## One Day Buddhist Empowerment Event

To inaugurate Saraha Nyingma Buddhist Institute in Eugene Tibetan Buddhist master, the Ven. Lama Tharchin Rinpoche, will confer Vajryana empowerment this Saturday, 7/28.

In the Vajrayana tradition, empowerment is an indispensable event which unites teacher and student, the altruistic aspiration for enlightenment with the living lineage of enlightened method, blessing and wisdom embodied in the teacher or Lama, who performs the ceremony. This particular empowerment, from the Dudjom Lineage of Tibetan Buddhism, is known as "Tso Kye Thug Thik" or "Heart Essence of the Lake-Born Guru."

From his compassion, Lama Tharchin Rinpoche, a tenth-generation lineage holder of the Ngakpa or yogic tradition of Tibetan Buddhism, and founding teacher of Saraha Institute, is offering this empowerment publicly here in Eugene. Both new and experienced students are welcome to receive it, either as a blessing, as a reinforcement to current Buddhist practice, or as a foundation for entry into the path of the Vajrayana. Henceforth, Saraha will be offering classes, regularly scheduled and special events of Buddhist instruction and training.

JUMPING ON THE BAGWAGON

In the ongoing debate over whether people are smart enough to learn to use reusable bags, the Eugene City Council will continue exploring a ban on single-use plastic bags in grocery stores at a public hearing Sept. 17.

If this sounds familiar, Eugene postponed past discussions of a bag ban to see if a 2011 statewide ban would pass. It didn't, and in the meantime individual cities including Portland and Corvallis have implemented local bans.

Oregonians use approximately 1.7 billion single-use plastic bags per year, which is about 500 per person per year, according to Environment Oregon's Sarah Higginbotham. "Eugene would be a leader to a statewide ban and remind people this is a smart, easy solution that helps the environment as well as cutting unnecessary costs to those already using reusable bags," she says.

There is a difference between a tax and a fee: One is avoidable and the other is not, according to City Councilor Alan Zelenka, and that's why in a 7-1 vote council chose to move forward with the fee option, though that could change after the Sept. 17 public hearing. "The 5-cent fee is necessary for two reasons," Zelenka says, "to avoid cost burden on businesses and give people incentive to bring reusable bags."

If the ordinance makes it past the public hearing and into city code, stores will have six months to a year to comply. The Northwest Grocery Association has supported other cities' bans as well as the statewide effort because of the extra burden that recycling plastic bags places on grocery stores and recycling centers, where plastic bags cause machinery problems.

The goal of this ban is an increase in reusable bags, not an increase in paper bags, according to Zelenka. "Grocers are committed to work on this community effort by giving away thousands of reusable bags in order to get this done," he says.

WOLF PUPS ADD TO OREGON PACKS

Two of Oregon's four known wolf packs, the Imnaha and the Wenaha pack, have each added four pups to the mix this year, bringing the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife count to approximately 37 confirmed wolves in Oregon, according to Josh Laughlin of Cascadia Wildlands. "And there's likely more," he says.

On June 27, ODFW announced a lactating female was caught on camera in the Eagle Cap Wilderness and pups may be in that area, too.

The pups were born thanks to a hold on a "kill order" on two wolves from the Imnaha pack, including the alpha male for allegedly killing livestock. The order to kill is on hold while the Oregon Court of Appeals considers an appeal from Cascadia Wildlands and other groups.

"It's an exciting yet challenging time for wolf recovery in Oregon," Laughlin says. One challenge may include last year's delisting of the gray wolf from federal protections offered by the Endangered Species Act.

In spite of the delisting, Oregon's wolves continue to receive state protections — for now. "One milestone we want to see for Oregon is all four packs be breeding pairs for three consecutive years," Michelle Dennehy of ODFW says. "And when that occurs, we will be able to delist them from Oregon's endangered species status." To qualify as a breeding pair, she says, a wolf pack must have at least two pups survive through Dec. 31.

Oregon has been "sanitized of wolves" for about 65 years, Laughlin says, after a governmental systematic extermination program took place to "make way for livestock production and to move manifest destiny west." The last wolf in Oregon was killed in Umpqua National Forest in 1947, he says.

Since the reintroduction of wolves to the states in 1995, they've migrated to historic ranges throughout the west. One wolf, known as OR-7, journeyed from Oregon's east side down to California. Nevertheless, as Laughlin says, "The recovering population still faces poaching and vitriolic attitudes laced with deeply seeded myths." Wolf OR-9 of the Imnaha pack was killed by a hunter in Idaho, where it's legal to hunt the wolves. The hunter had an expired tag.

"The question is not about whether or not Oregon is going to have wolves, but rather whether we can reduce the conflict as the wolf populations make their comeback," says Laughlin. "Human tolerance is going to be key in defining gray wolf recovery here in the Pacific Northwest," he says. "We have the ability to create a wildlife recovery success story."

PET ME!

The word pet has meant "a domesticated, fondled young animal," "a spoiled child," "offense at being slighted" or, a personal favorite, "breaking wind, fart," according to philologist Leo Spitzer, who once wrote an entire essay on the etymology of the word.

"Pets" these days has come to mean animals that you treat like family: dogs, cats, even fish. A pig that might be livestock to a farmer who intends to make her into bacon is a loved family pet to someone else — they say pigs are smart. Eugeneans love their pets from ferrets to fish, and whether milking them or dancing with them, our animal friends (or as some prefer, the "furkids") are part of our daily lives.

They say if you love something set it free. In the case of a domesticated animal, if you love it, take care of it. For those of us who are our pet's "person" rather than "owner," a collar might seem oppressive, but you'll be happy you did it after Fido or Fluffy runs away, and you're waiting for the call to tell you that your puppy or kitty has been found. Put ID on your pet, microchip him and, as EW reminds you every year, always spay and neuter your pets. — Camilla Mortensen

The Worms Crawl in ...

KITTIES AND THEIR CREEPY CRAWLIES by Mike W. Davis

Cats love to put their butts in your face. It's a feline way of saying "Hello." What's truly disturbing is when there is a host of little worms all wiggling out of kitty's bottom, saying "Hello," too. For such fastidious animals, cats can carry a whole lot of worms and parasites.

We've all heard the "crazy cat lady" stereotype, but parasites might be the problem, not cats. A new study from Denmark suggests that women with a Toxoplasma gondii infection have an increased risk of self-directed violence. The study explores how the bug has been linked to behavioral, affective and cognitive disorders in people. The study screened newly born children for T. gondii infection while associating the mother's self-directed violence as a neurological imbalance caused by the bug.

Studies find that the parasite known as T. gondii should not be underestimated. It lies dormant in a feline's intestinal tract and rarely does a cat show physical symptoms. But this widespread neurotropic protozoan parasite affects approximately one-third of the human population worldwide with symptoms ranging from little to none in most common cases to severe behavioral disorders in rare cases, according to scientists. People can be infected by ingestion of the eggs spread from feces of an infected cat, eating uncooked meat or contaminated water.

Maybe this is how the "crazy cat lady" came to be. The parasite's effects on the brain — not a kitty obsession — are responsible for erratic behavior.

Self-directed violence in mothers and crazy cat ladies is only a small part of what to be concerned about when it comes to T. gondii.

According to Eugene veterinarian Sheila Johnson, "T. gondii is very serious and can cause birth defects in children, so pregnant women should be careful when cleaning the litter box."

Although with all this talk of T. gondii in cats and the threat it poses, changing the litter box may sound alarming, but "You are more likely to contract it from ingesting infected, undercooked meat," Johnson says.

So before the thought of giving your beloved cat away

VETERINARIAN

sinks in, remember that there are other health concerns much more likely to enter your home.

The most common parasitic worms found in most animals, including your cat, are roundworm and tapeworm. Outdoor cats are more likely to expose themselves to worms through the environment. Fecal droppings, ingesting infected prey and dirt are among the many ways roundworms get picked up. The tapeworm, on the other hand, is most commonly given to your cat by fleas.

"We see a lot of roundworms, primarily in kittens, and those worms can be about a half a foot," Johnson says. "That's why it's very important to deworm your animals regularly."

The dewormer used on most animals is a neurotoxin that paralyzes the worm, which exits the cat from the anus and dies, according to Johnson.

"We'll get frantic phone calls from people finding worms on their carpets and we have to assure them that the worm coming out is what we want," Johnson says.

Cats have a reputation for being assiduous groomers, but they, too, can miss a spot. All it can take is that one fleabite or ingesting the wrong critter before your cat's insides are crawling with hungry worms. If you see symptoms, it's better to be safe in the vet's office then sorry with worms crawling out of your cat's butt.

Labanies and Griffichons, Let's Boogie!

DOGS HIT THE DANCE FLOOR by Andy Valentine

Moving to the rhythm of musical composition is as intrinsic to most as breathing. We humans just can't resist tapping our toes, drumming our fingers, flailing our arms and swaying our hips, and while we've all experienced moments of solitary dance that must remain exclusively behind closed doors, in public it still takes two to do-si-do. "Why not tango?" you ask. Well, some folks have partners that aren't quite capable of showcasing their gancho. These are the people that dance with dogs.

That's right. It's a real thing, and it's called "musical canine freestyle." Turns out dogs can actually become pretty adept at dancing, though balancing on the hind legs would cause any quadruped a few problems, and this means that there's unlikely to be any mid-routine ballroom lifts or fluid pirouettes taking place. Honestly, though, most of them are a little more rhythmically inclined than some of the white dudes that I've seen "krumping" unabashedly in public.

While it may look as though the dogs are simply wildin' out and trotting freely in circles around their leaders (who are always human, otherwise there'd be a lot of booty-sniffing), canine freestyle is actually a fastidiously choreographed exercise in obedience training: Every prompt is firm and deliberate, so that the pooch knows what to do — it's a cue system, and not surprisingly, the majority of commands are verbal.

"As freestylers we try and get all the behaviors in a routine on verbal cues," says Julie Flanery of Wonderdogs, a Philomath-based dog-training facility. "We want to keep our hands and arms free for musical interpretation, and it to look like the dog is doing it on its own."

Flanery has been involved with canine freestyle since her first competition in 2001. She began teaching a year later, and since 2003 she's been a regular judge on the freestyle circuit.

"I've competed in many, many dog sports," she continues, "and freestyle is, in my opinion, one of the most difficult to perform well in, but also the most fun."

And she's not kidding about it being difficult; choreographing a routine requires a great amount of discipline not only for the dogs, but for the humans, too. In a two-minute period, trainers can end up imparting anywhere between 75 and 85 cues upon their poochie partners, and this means that they're constantly talking to the dog. The volume of the music and softness of voice often help to cover this up, and this furthers the illusion that the dog is unaided.

"It's that engagement and relationship with the dog that I have not found in any other dog sport," Flanery says.

Wonderdogs does offer classes in other dog sports, but Flanery attempts to keep freestyle on the docket at least once a week:

"The amount of freestyle classes we offer varies," she says. "It depends on interest: last session I had two freestyle classes that were both full. Most of the classes are rally-free; they combine rally obedience with freestyle."

"We use clicker training so that the dogs understand to offer behaviors," she continues. "It's the dogs coming up with their own moves so it feels as though they really have input in the partnership."

Naturally, as with any training system, there's a learning curve. Partnerships that are just starting out tend to commence with four-paw tricks such as spins — turning in a circle next to the handler — circles — moving in physical circles around the handler — and weaves — threading themselves between the handler's legs. Once the novice level moves have been mastered, then the partnerships tend to advance toward perfecting those same techniques, only backwards. The hind-leg stuff, it seems, is for experts only.

"I like to think we do everything that Ginger Rogers did — you know, in high heels and backwards — but with dogs," Flanery says. "My favorite thing is engaging with my dog in a way that we are truly partners in the training process. And of course once you add music to anything it makes it more fun!"

So there you have it; hard to believe, I know, but dogs could actually be able to show us humans some new dance moves. Next time you throw on "Crocodile Rock" and start to boogie, keep an eye on your canines; they might just be achin' for a booty shakin' too.

BACKYARD FISH FOR FUN AND FOOD

by Dante Zuñiga-West

If you're the type of animal lover that doesn't want to really "pet" your pet, if you're allergic to felines, disliking of dogs or repulsed by reptilians, then fish are the way to go. And what better way to experience your fishy friends than in a natural setting, like an outdoor pond?

When thinking of an outdoor fish pond, images of fancy meditation gardens, giant water lilies and expensive manmade waterfalls come to mind. But you don't need to be stacked with cash to pull off having a nice outdoor pond setup. You can actually make it happen with a couple hundred bucks and some good old-fashioned yard work.

"It all starts with a hole in the ground," Aqua Serene employee James Whisman says. "Once you dig your hole, you can go with a preformed pond or pond liner."

Whisman can often be found running around the rear portion of the Aqua Serene store tending to the needs of customers who are trying to purchase or upgrade their pond equipment. He says that a small backyard fish pond is not very hard to maintain, and that many people have them.

It's cheapest to go with pond liner, as some of the preformed ponds can get a little spendy, like up to $1,000. Pond liner — which is basically a very thick rubber membrane — goes for about 95 cents per square foot. So if you're backyard isn't something out of an MTV Cribs episode, don't worry. You can still score a 10 by 10 piece of liner for about $100.

You'll need a filter and pump system. And although there are a multitude of systems out there, a small backyard pond can get away with only needing a simple drop-in filter and pump. You can pick one up online for $100, or grab one in a store for slightly more. And just like that, you can be the proud new owner of a backyard pond. Adding water will help. We suggest using a garden hose.

Once your pond is up and running, the last step is getting your new pets. Goldfish and koi are world-renowned favorites for outdoor ponds. These fish keep pretty well in our weird Oregon weather, and they make great pets; they eat stuff like wheat germ pellets and can be pretty friendly.

Her koi are kind of like friends, Junction City resident and fish lover Pat Straube says, "and they are really easy to take care of."

Straube has a large outdoor pond with seven koi, some of which are 3 feet long. She says that in the morning when she wakes up to feed her fish, they know she is approaching and swim to her. "They are very attentive and they like to be cared for," she says.

Pets are wonderful, they provide affection, companionship and fulfillment. But let us not overlook the fact that we live in hard times. Macroeconomic recession, food shortages and evil factory farms are daunting realities. Sustainability is paramount and your backyard pond (and fish) can help make a difference, in terms of dinner.

According to Whisman, "In Oregon, raising tilapia or trout is your best bet."

Yes, that backyard pond could be your backyard surplus of tasty organic food. Just make sure if you're farming trout to get a big strong pump. Trout need moving water, or their meat becomes mushy. As for the tilapia, you will need to obtain a permit from ODFW, as they are a controlled species of fish in Oregon.

To be clear, we aren't condoning the eating of pets. We're just pointing out that outdoor fishponds are a world of fun and opportunity. So go check out your backyard, grab a shovel and get the hose.

Mini Goats

URBAN HOMESTEADING'S FINAL FRONTIER by Ephraim Payne

Urban homesteading, backyard farming — call it what you will, the movement for self sufficiency and sustainable living is booming. In Eugene neighborhoods from the South Hills to the Whiteaker it seems like every other house sports a chicken coop or custom greenhouse. Soon, the most dedicated local homesteaders may be able to join ranks of urban farming trailblazers elsewhere who are exploring a new way of bringing the farm to the city: raising miniature goats.

While Portland's goat-raising community is large enough to organize bike-based tours a la Eugene's annual Tour De Coop, potential goat farmers here face a more elementary challenge: working with the city government to legalize mini goats on normal-sized city lots. Currently, the city of Eugene's municipal code lumps miniature goats in with all farm animals besides rabbits and chickens, banning such livestock on lots smaller than 20,000 square feet, or almost half an acre. The code also requires 5,000 square feet of space for each goat over six months old. Earlier this year, the Eugene City Council directed the planning department to come up with a revised livestock code balancing the demand for micro livestock with the requirements of an increasingly dense urban environment.

The term miniature goat covers a multitude of small goat breeds and varieties. Pygmy goats, originating in West and Central Africa, have been crossed with Nigerian, Nubian and Oberian dairy goats, Spanish, Kiko and Boer meat goats and even fiber-producing Angoras. Herd animals that need the company of other goats or friendly animals but don't do well with most dogs, the little goats range in size from about 50 to 130 pounds.

So why would any sane city dweller want to raise goats in the first place? Aren't they smelly and ornery and a ton of work to raise? Not really, not at all and not enough to make you quit your day job, answers Cheryl Smith, who has literally written the book on goat care. Two books actually: Goat Health Care and Raising Goats for Dummies.

"They have all of the features of the large-size goat, but just in a smaller package," she says. "Because of that, they are ideal for the urban resident who wants to get milk."

Smith, who raises Oberians (mini-Oberhaslis) on her Mystic Acres Farm northeast of Eugene, says that dairy goats are bred for good temperament, making them easier to milk and friendly, enjoyable companions. Only un-neutered males, good for breeding a herd but not pet goat material, are smelly. But, she adds, you can't just expect to buy a goat, pop it in the backyard and start milking.

Prospective goat owners need to learn proper goat care and prepare their yards, fencing off roses and vegetable gardens or any other precious plants, ridding the yard of any plants or weeds noxious to goats and removing lead-based paint curious goats can nibble. "It's not to be taken lightly; they are not as easy as chickens," says Smith, who experienced a steep learning curve her first five years raising goats and lost some animals. "It was a really hard learning experience and I don't want anyone else to go through that. They can live for 15, 16 years; you can bond with them."

Bill Bezuk, owner of Eugene's Backyard Farmer, testified before the City Council in favor of adopting code changes to allow mini goats on smaller city lots. He says he promotes micro-livestock because of their value for sustainability and local food production, and will stock goat feed once the city code changes. He notes that backyard farmers typically start with chickens and progress to beekeeping, with miniature goats being the final frontier for the most dedicated urban homesteaders — people with time on their hands who are willing to take on the extra commitment living with goats requires. "I think that, were the regulations approved, there would be less than 100 people who would want to do goats in their backyard," Bezuk says.

City of Eugene Land Use Analyst Kristie Brown says the city is reviewing the current code and researching how other cities handle micro-livestock. Most likely, she says, the new code will allow a yet-to-be-determined number of miniature goats on most lots. The planning commission and then the City Council will hold hearings once a draft code change is complete. Anyone interested in the process can put their names on an interested parties list to receive notifications when hearings are scheduled and be able to comment on staff recommendations ahead of time.

Hot Pets

ANIMALS NEED TO KEEP COOL, TOO by Camilla Mortensen

It happens every summer. Someone makes a quick trip to the mall and leaves her dog in the car "just for a couple minutes." But the lines get long, the minutes drag on and before long that car sitting in the sun has gotten unbearably hot. A Stanford University study shows that on a 72-degree day a car can heat up to 116 degrees in only an hour. Every summer dogs and even cats get heatstroke, and some die.

The rest of the country has been hit with blazing temperatures while Oregon has remained relatively cool, but it only takes one hot afternoon to hurt your pet. "I'm positive dogs in this community have died in this community from being left in a hot car," Kelly Darnell, interim Animal Services Program manager for Eugene, says.

Dogs are more sensitive to heat than people realize, and flat-faced animals such as pugs, as well as older or overweight dogs, are extra-sensitive to high temps.

Even animals that live outside need to stay cool. On hot days many zoos freeze treats or big blocks of water for animals to lick. Birders recommend leaving a puddle of water in your yard as a birdbath so wild birds can stop by and cool off on hot, dry days. If you see a bird standing with its legs far from its body and its wings spread, it's usually trying to cool off. Horses, sheep, pet goats and other livestock need shade and access to water as well.

Darnell says even with the brief heat spells we've had the city has already had calls about hot animals. So what do you do if you see a dog in car and you think it's too hot? "It's hard to know — you're at a shopping mall and see a hot pet, who do you call?" Darnell says.

Who you call depends on where that mall is. Eugene, Springfield and Lane County have their own numbers. Darnell says in the city of Eugene calling the animal services number, 687-4060, will send your call to the 911 dispatch center.

Eugene will either send an animal welfare officer, or if there is none available, an actual police officer will come, Darnell says, adding, "We take these hot dogs calls really seriously." The animal officers have special laser thermometers that tell how hot the inside of the car is, she says.

If the car is too hot, the officer will get the dog out, get it into the shade and give it water, and if the owner can't be found, take it to the 1st Avenue Animal Shelter. A notice is left for the owner.

Dogs, cats and other pets can also get too hot exercising in the heat of the day, or even being left outside in a hot yard. Darnell says to keep an eye out for excessive panting, increased heart rate and respiration, drooling, weakness, vomiting and collapsing. She recommends making sure your pet has access to water and shade at all times on hot days and if it's really hot, bring pets inside to where there's a fan or air conditioning.

Darnell says the city will be doing outreach and putting up flyers at Walmart, Valley River Center and other big department stores to remind people that heat hurts dogs, too. EW

We're spoiled with a great wealth of poetry readings that take place on the regular in Eugene. This is a great thing. That inundation of readings, however, can at times cause us to overlook some of the strongest readers and most compelling poetry.

DIVA will be hosting A New Poetry Series Saturday with guest poets Jared Stanley, David Abel and Cecelia Hagen, all of whom are evocative and venerated wordsmiths. Even in our poetry-soaked town of verse-slinging virtuosos, these three writers stand out.

Stanley, the Arizona-born, Reno-based poet from the Unmanned Minerals art collective is the author of the cult chapbook How the Desert Did Me In, as well as a newer collection of poems entitled The Weeds. He's also an Iowa Writer's Workshop alum. Abel, a Portland poet, radio personality, teacher and bookseller, is a cross-disciplinary whirlwind of words. And Hagen is a Pacific Northwest superstar whose writing has appeared in Blood Orange Review, Caffeine Destiny and Rolling Stone. This isn't some average open-mic night, it's a celebration of excellent contemporary poets and their work – go and listen.

A New Poetry Series begins 7:30pm Saturday, July 28, at DIVA.

The art of the deal

What can a person buy with $2.50 these days? A pack of gum? A ballpoint pen? Perhaps a single condom? Certainly not a gallon of gas anymore. But if you have a few bucks in your pocket Saturday, July 28, you can come away with some beautifully strange art, art supplies, CDs and who knows what else at Eugene Storefront Project's (ESAP) Trailer Park Art Sale.

"One of the dilemmas we have here in Eugene is that it's hard to get people to come out and buy art," Marc Gunther says. "So we said, screw it, let's have a real people's art show."

Gunther is one of ESAP's three founding members, alongside Paula Goodbar and Peter Herley. He says that the Trailer Park Art Sale was originally Herley's idea, and that this year ESAP is flooded with stuff that's both bizarre and worth checking out.

"We've gotten a lot of really weird stuff donated for this show," Gunther says. "I mean, someone came in and donated a ceramic chicken lamp."

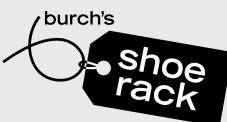

Oddities and art will be heaped en masse all over the ESAP gallery space, and the come-ups don't stop there. Gunther says the Trailer Park Art Sale was originally going to be a barbecue sort of thing, but thanks to sponsorships and donations by Mezza Luna, Pizza Pipeline and Ninkasi, there will now be pizza and beer on hand. So for $2.50 you can get a slice of pizza, and for another $2.50 you can score some offbeat artwork. That's a pretty good deal.

The bottom line is this is a cheap garage sale by artists, with beer and pizza. It also serves as a benefit for ESAP. Who wouldn't want to stop by, see what there is to dig up and support local art at the same time? There's even a rumor going around that, due to the excessive amount of art and art supplies that have arrived recently at ESAP, the gallery may open its doors on Sunday, July 29, as well.

ESAP's Trailer Park Art Sale opens 6 pm Saturday, July 28, at ESAP headquarters; for more info, go to eugenestorefrontartproject.org – Dante Zuñiga-West

Last Exit to Gotham

The Dark Knight Rises but fails to fly

THE DARK KNIGHT RISES: Directed by Christopher Nolan. Screenplay by Jonathan and Christopher Nolan, based on a story by the Nolans based on characters created by Bob Kane. Cinematography, Wally Pfister. Editor, Lee Smith. Music, Hans Zimmer. Starring Christian Bale, Michael Caine, Gary Oldman, Anne Hathaway, Tom Hardy, Marion Cotillard, Morgan Freeman. Warner Bros. Pictures, 2012. PG-13. 165 minutes. ★ ★ ★ ☆ ☆

High expectations sometimes lay you low, and the very word "superhero" spurs one's anticipation of a movie adaptation to leap tall multiplexes in a single bound and travel faster than a speeding bullet to the box office. It can't be helped. Walking into the July 20 midnight premiere of The Dark Knight Rises, my hopes were high. I assumed that this grand finale would be not only a step above all predecessors, but also well worth the particular discomfort of cramming into a packed theater at midnight. Neither of these assumptions panned out.

Don't get me wrong: The Dark Knight Rises isn't complete bat guano. It has enough redeeming qualities to allow for some people to overlook the glaring flaws. First off, the film has guts, confronting our fears of terrorism and militant police states, as well as full-blown economic collapses. Director Christopher Nolan (who also helmed the first two films in the trilogy) plunges the viewer into a Gotham City that metastatizes from peaceful and prosperous to dangerous and defunct.

And don't worry: In the end, all those bat-toys come out to blow stuff up in fine fashion. The special effects will not disappoint you, the soundtrack is superb and the cinematography is solid. Here's the first problem, though: The Dark Knight Rises is two hours and 45 minutes in duration and, at that length, screenwriting brothers Christopher and Jonathan Nolan's story arc could not be properly sustained. The movie needs to be way shorter, and even then it should contain more connective tissue.

The Dark Knight Rises opens with a scene of Abu Ghraib-style black-bagged prisoners being driven to some airstrip in the middle of nowhere. A CIA agent oversees the prisoner transfer, the plane takes off and, within moments, moviegoers are treated to a spectacular mid-air hijacking. Enter Bane (Tom Hardy), the new Batman bad guy who looks like a hybrid of Darth Vader and Vin Diesel. Unfortunately, Bane's character

Granted, after the late Heath Ledger's bloodcurdlingly epic portrayal of the Joker, any ensuing Batman mega-villain has some pretty nasty boots to fill. Bane, however, just doesn't present a quality super villain — that is to say, he is not super; he's just a villain. Bane's iniquity is more suited to something out of the Die Hard movies, where he'd be fine playing opposite Bruce Willis. Not only does Bane lack the charismatic flare required of a Batman baddie, but his villainous voice is nearly impossible to understand. Just because you're wearing a souped-up SARs mask and need to counterbalance Christian Bale's raspy Batman voice doesn't mean you can be aggravatingly inaudible.

Other places where the film falls short include a distended storyline; a lackluster Cat Woman (Anne Hathaway); Bale spending more time as an emo Bruce Wayne than as an ass-whooping super bat; and a generic cohort of mercenaries-turned-terrorists who all somehow happen to be black, Middle Eastern, Asian or just very tan Europeans.

This last dynamic is rather interesting. Given that Gotham is intended to mirror the look and demographic of cities like New York and Chicago, the fictional city's inherent lack of diversity among its residents is curious. They're pretty much all white, excluding Morgan Freeman, some football players and a cop or two.

I wanted to like this movie. I returned the following day to see it again, despite the horrific shooting less than 24 hours beforehand in Aurora, Colo., that killed 12 people and injured 58 more at the midnight screening of The Dark Knight Rises. I wish I could tell you I was paying full attention to the movie, but I can't. My eyes kept scanning the emergency exits, just like the dude next to me. The collective consciousness of moviegoers that night — and perhaps forever — was seriously rattled.

So maybe I didn't get the best second look at The Dark Knight Rises. And yet, for the periods of time I wasn't memorizing the exits and premeditating the best escape route, I did enjoy the movie a bit more. Maybe it really is better the second time around. Or maybe it's just that those high expectations were no longer present. EW

Hang 'em high

Though the name sounds a bit ominous, Shovels and Rope's music is nothing short of a good time. The group adopted that name after releasing an album with the same title. The songs off that record are a collection of murder ballads, telling grim stories about digging and hanging, but that content doesn't entirely sum up the music of Cary Ann Hearst and Michael Trent.

Let's say you were taking a long walk through a dark wood; these are the sounds you'd want to hear if you stumbled into a clearing, alone, unarmed and open to the celebration of good company. It's campfire music that could find itself equally at home in a dusty, half-empty tavern.

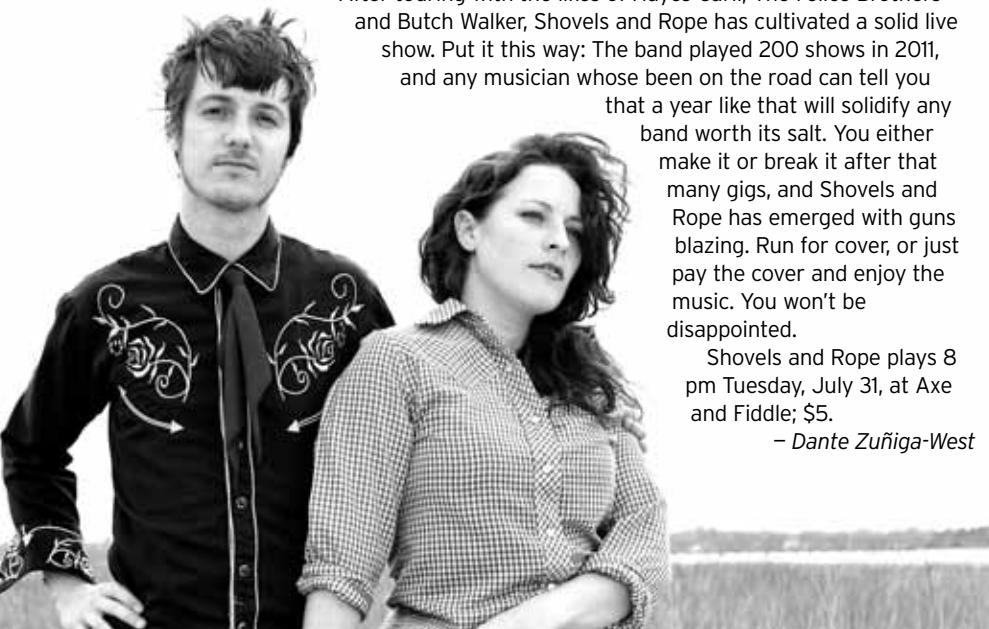

Hearst's vocals are bare-boned, powerful and compelling. Trent is a throwback, whose aptitude on the drums and harmonica is matter-of-fact solid. Hailing from Charleston, S.C., this duo has been on the road since 2010 and recently embarked upon a coast-to-coast tour that lands them Tuesday in Eugene. If you love harmony-driven folk music, old drums, tambourines and lonesome vocals, this is a band you will want to experience.

After touring with the likes of Hayes Carll, The Felice Brothers and Butch Walker, Shovels and Rope has cultivated a solid live show. Put it this way: The band played 200 shows in 2011, and any musician whose been on the road can tell you that a year like that will solidify any band worth its salt. You either make it or break it after that many gigs, and Shovels and Rope has emerged with guns blazing. Run for cover, or just pay the cover and enjoy the music. You won't be disappointed.

Shovels and Rope plays 8 pm Tuesday, July 31, at Axe and Fiddle; $5.

— Dante Zuñiga-West

Religiosity

Eliza Rickman is an L.A.-based folk singer but she very well could have been plucked straight out of a dark, twisted fairy tale. With black hair, gorgeous eyes and the vocal chops to match, Rickman is nothing to be overlooked.

Her relationship with music spurred from a dark place. After a move to California at the impressionable age of 12, Rickman quickly realized Los Angeles wasn't all movie stars and palm trees. Music became her reprieve from that depression. With the sounds of Elton John and the Beatles at her side, Rickman began healing.

"I knew I would never be the Beatles, but I loved that something could help me get out of that terrible place," Rickman says. "I really thought it would be a great thing to provide that coping mechanism for somebody else."

That element of catharsis is what makes

Rickman's music so therapeutic, elegant and unique.

"I suppose I'm trying to help people understand it's okay to be sad," she says. "I think it's okay to revel in that for a while and experience that sadness."

Growing up as a pastor's daughter, Rickman can't help but bring faith into her lyrics. "There is at least one religious reference in each song on my album," Rickman says. "It's something I was raised with and taught to think a lot about."

With graceful undertones of religiosity that question the contradictory nature of our human existence, Rickman brings even more substance to her already complex musical repertoire.

Rickman plays 9 pm Thursday, July 26, at Sam Bond's; $1-$5.

Dumb and Doper

From the dungeons of the underground comes Dumbfoundead — a rhymesayer whose lyricism is capable of reaching to the outermost corners of the hip-hop universe and beyond. Blasting onto the scene in 2007 with the epic Super Barrio Brothers album, the Argentine-born emcee of Korean descent wasted no time in establishing himself as the ultimate videogame rapper. We're talking hardcore videogame nerd rap, complete with audio samples straight outta your old Super Nintendo game console.

What Phoenix Orion did in 1999, when he released Zimulated Experiencez — arguably the most overlooked and seminal science fiction-themed rap album in hip-hop history — Dumbfoundead did with Super Barrio Brothers and gamer culture. It is doubtful that anyone will surpass the precedent he set with those tracks and, really, any other emcee attempting to blend videogames and hip hop into one cohesive album would at best achieve equal status.

But Dumbfoundead is no one-trick pony. Which makes sense for a kid whose formative years were spent running around the shady parts of Los Angeles battle-rapping in the same environment as infamous rap tyrant Cadalack Ron, or tearing up open-mic stages with numerous other Project Blowed prodigies.

New cuts from the album Love Everyday display Dumbfoundead's ability to tackle completely different subject matter. These songs are almost entirely focused on love, relationships and the struggle of an independent artist in love with his work. Funky hooks and jazzy samples are flexed and flexed again as Dumbfoundead wields a slower cadence tailored to listeners who appreciate storytelling.

Dumb hasn't just evolved in terms of his content; his stage show has come along with him. He is now a true showman, capable of moving the crowd and prowling the stage with the confidence of a troubadour. Simply put, he's advanced to the next level of the game, and he's touring the West Coast to prove it.

Dumbfoundead plays with Watsky 9 pm Saturday, July 28, at WOW Hall; $10 adv., $12 door.

The Living Crystal Faery Realm

How does one harden the masonry of a legend? The Rock & Roll Hall of Fame in Cleveland, Ohio, honored Donovan this year with an induction that's more than well deserved, and as a result he's emerged from the woodwork to begin touring again, with three festivals booked for the summer. Donovan has been called "the British Bob Dylan" among other things, but there's far more to be said for the Scotch-born bard than simply "he and Dylan knew each other." In case you're unfamiliar, he's the guy that wrote "Hurdy Gurdy Man," "Mellow Yellow" and "Catch the Wind," to name a minute selection.

Ohhh, that Donovan. Yeah, that Donovan.

"I'm kind of a bard from the old," he says. "A lot of my work draws very strongly on the so-called Celtic roots where I come from. There's a lot of lore and magic, and the tales we all grew up with; it all comes up in my music."

After being honored with music's highest recognition, Donovan decided it was time to "stretch his musical muscles," and that, teamed with what appears to be nostalgia (and the memory that music once scored him a sandwich, a cup of tea and two girls), has led him back to Oregon. When asked, he only has thin recollections of our state, but it's clear that he's been here before and fits right in.

"I remember doing a concert over there," he says, speaking excitedly from across the pond, "possibly at a university. Ken Kesey dropped by."

Donovan will be stopping in to headline Faerieworlds, the explorative arts festival taking place July 27-29 in the meadows of Mount Pisgah, and he says he's especially excited to share his love for what he calls "the Faery realm." He'll also be debuting a new show called "The Living Crystal Faery Realm," with a band formed specifically for this event, in an attempt to spread the wealth of the fourth dimension.

"I come from Bohemia," Donovan says. "Not the country — the state of mind."

Faerieland is no different to where meditation takes you — a fourth level of consciousness. The Beatles and I brought this consciousness back from India, one that people needed in the Western World, and it's about a place inside us that we can access. I suppose we could call it the spirit world, and we can only access it in altered states."

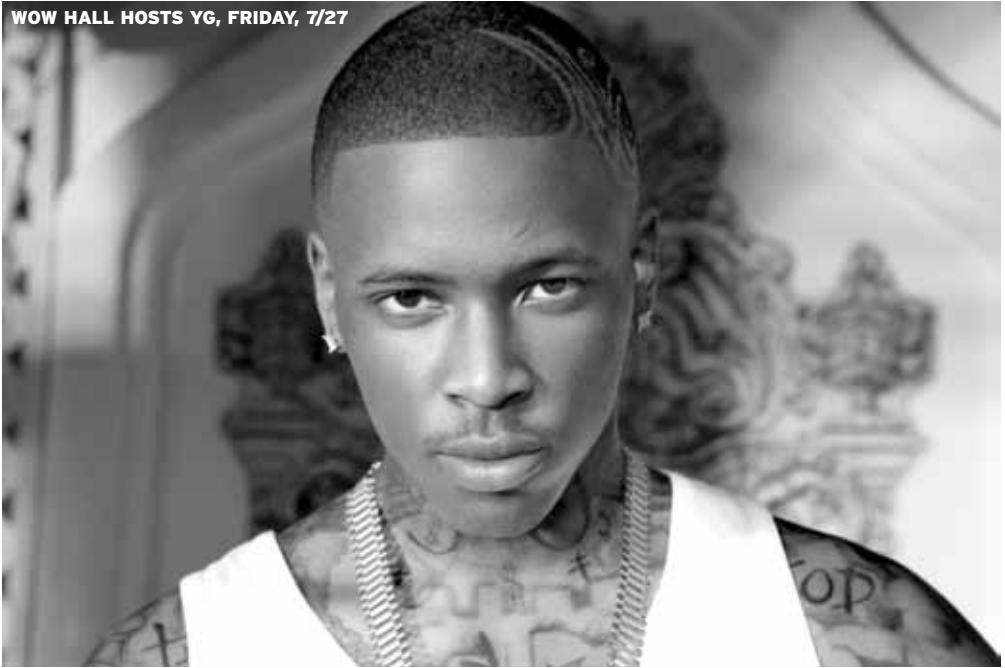

Look, the legendary Donovan is somehow making it out to Eugene. And though it may be tough keeping track of all the groups you wanna see at this festival, it's certainly recommended that you check him out. After all, it's fucking Donovan, and he's psyched to see his "Oregonian pals" again.

Donovan plays Sunday, July 29, at Faerieworlds Music and Arts Festival; for more info, go to faerieworlds.com

Bringin' It Back Home

Eugene-bred jazzers return to roost

Like swallows to Capistrano, the prodigal jazzers are flying back to Eugene. Over the past decade or so, the UO music school has regularly cranked out attention-getting young musicians who combine promising technique with creative ambition. Unfortunately, it's all too common for most of these students to leave town — and Oregon — as they seek out new challenges and opportunities.

Many Eugene-trained musicians who focused primarily on jazz and contemporary postclassical music wound up in New York City, where it's at least theoretically possible for a promising young performer to find mentors, grab the attention of music business types who can advance their careers, soak up ideas and inspiration from the world's jazz and new music capital, and maybe eventually cobble together a living through teaching and the occasional paying gig.

Next week, thanks in part to this month's UO jazz camp, several of those prodigal Ducks are coming back to Eugene to visit old haunts and old friends and show us what they've learned in the ensuing years. On Friday, July 27, sweet-toned trumpeter Josh Deutsch returns to play his original music — with a quintet featuring fellow UO alums Jason Palmer on drums and the excellent Portland pianist Greg Goebel — for this season's final concert in the Broadway Avenue House Concert series at 911 W. Broadway. Now living in Queens, the Seattle-born Deutsch earned his master's degree at the UO in 2009; he's performed at major jazz festivals and won some attention as a category-defying composer, with commissions of jazz, contemporary classical and areas in between, from the Seattle Symphony and others.

While living in Eugene a few years back, Deutsch led an ensemble called Poisonous Birds that featured an extremely promising composer and saxophonist, Hashem Assadullahi, who moved to New York City a year or so ago. The night after Deutsch's concert, Saturday, July 28, Assadullahi returns to play a concert at the Jazz Station with a quartet of longtime colleagues, including Portland guitarist Justin Morell, bassist Tyler Abbott and drummer Ryan Biesack. They'll play some of the striking, guitar-enhanced new works featured on Assadullahi's upcoming CD. It'll also be a bachelor party — Assadullahi gets married the next day.

A few years before Deutsch and Assadullahi roamed the UO scene, other ambitious UO music students were somehow able to find time between classes, recitals, practice sessions and the rest to create original soundtracks to classic films (much more common these days hereabouts than it was then) and stage other events somewhat afield of standard academic settings. One of them was Brian McWhorter, a phenomenal trumpeter who went on to become one of New York's first-call new music horn men, revivifying the Meridian Arts Ensemble and earning a national reputation.

McWhorter returned to Eugene a few years ago as a member of the UO music faculty, and he also leads the adventurous new music ensemble Beta Collide. That sextet plays Aug. 1 at Sam Bond's in a show that features a sterling cast of fellow UO faculty members, including saxophonist Steve Owen, keyboard whiz Toby Koenigsberg, percussionist Pius Cheung and several other fine players. Beta Collide will perform arrangements of music by the late, great Montreal-based world music singer Lhasa de Sela, an early Lilith Fair star who sang lovely, haunting originals in Spanish, English and French before succumbing in 2010 to breast cancer at age 37.

Beta Collide will open for McWhorter's old UO colleague, Kyle Sanna, who composed and played guitar in new silent film scores and other projects. He's lived in — where else? — New York for more than a decade and is now based in the new music hot spot of Brooklyn. Sanna is returning with fiddler Dana Lynn. Together, they'll play a wide selection of eclectic music ranging from traditional Irish tunes to originals to improvisations. EW

Great Starts

Convenience wins out over economics

Tera Rutecki

To all the people who grow and sell vegetable starts, thank you! Those little trays of baby plants, locally grown and ready to go, are well worth the money for a casual gardener like me. I love eating out of the garden, but there are only two of us. I don't need to grow a heap of food, and I don't have a lot of time to harvest and put food by. Besides, I like to support the local farmers, who grow many things far better than I can.

Growing vegetables from seed is much more economical — as long as you are successful. But if your situation is similar to mine, there's a good chance that a seed packet holds more seed than you really need for one season. Admittedly, seed properly stored remains viable for another year or several, depending on the crop. But if the economy of growing things from seed depends on keeping seed from year to year, do you have the right conditions to store seed properly? Are you well organized? And how do you compensate for declining germination rates?

Most things are not difficult to grow from seed, if you pay attention. This is especially true of crops sown directly in the ground, such as salad greens, carrots, squash and beans. Growing certain things from seed can, however, be quite a challenge if you have pest problems. In my neighborhood, every salad and carrot bed has to be protected from cats. That's a minor challenge compared to dealing with the world's largest population of mollusks. The slugs here are as big as mice, and snails festoon every other plant on a cool morning. Spinach? Forget it.

Then you have to worry about seedlings drying out on a sunny day. Fresh, healthy starts are reliable and require a bit less vigilance. Starts may seem expensive, but they help me produce organic food far more cheaply than I can buy it, and very little goes to waste. For me, at least, convenience wins out.

When conditions are right, high-quality starts can double in size in a day or two. Good soil preparation, followed by careful and immediate watering in, ensures they grow away strongly. For six starts, I work a handful of organic fertilizer into the soil before I plant. To be on the safe side, especially in early spring when soils are cool, I follow the advice of a grower who suggested watering at planting and every couple of weeks thereafter with liquid organic fertilizer. That makes it pretty hard to fail.

This year I missed the one good window in late winter for planting peas, so I used starts in April. I planted a tray of snow and snap pea starts around a plant tower and got a hefty crop, more than enough for two of us and occasional guests for the three or four weeks the pea plants were producing well. In warm weather I picked them every morning for two or three days, until I had enough for a meal. It worked out fine. Last year I did the same with green beans.

One of my favorite candidates for purchasing as starts is cilantro. Six sturdy little plants produce copious greens for several weeks. Before those plants go to seed, another tray goes in the ground. Each tray costs less than two bunches at the market, and there are no leftovers going slimy in the fridge. More importantly, we can use cilantro on the spur of the moment, so we get to enjoy it more often.

Starts seem doubly worth it at this time of year, when we should be gearing up again for a fall garden. Some people grow their own starts from seed, keeping them under cover to avoid the scorching sun while they wait for some vacant ground. Since I find that, for instance, six kale plants each of two varieties is plenty (and we like kale!) starts make more sense for me than seed. I'll still sow short-term fall and overwintering salad crops, because I can do that when the weather cools down in September. There's more space in the garden by then.

If you are a serious vegetable gardener and you need lots of produce or desire specific varieties, seed is undoubtedly the way to go. Maybe you save your own seed, or share packets of purchased seed with a group of friends. If none of these apply, and especially if you are a beginner, I recommend farmer-grown starts. We are blessed with several farmers who reliably offer an amazing variety of high-quality starts, practically year-round. Just be sure to shop where the trays have not been allowed to dry out or get root bound. I buy most of mine at farmers markets, from people like Tera of Morning Sun Organics.

Friends are welcome to join family in a celebration of life for our dear Howard Ingber who passed on this Wednesday, July 18th at the age of 63. He gave life his all, leaving New York City for the West Coast as a young man, joining the draft resisters movement in California, living with integrity in rural Canada, honing his skills and artistic sensibility as a carpenter/contractor in Eugene, supporting the WOW Hall as an active board member, and cheerleading for the Village School in innumerable ways as a dynamic volunteer and board member. Most of all he was a dear friend to so many, actively involved in others' lives, encouraging, and sharing his spark and his passions. We love you, Howie. You will be profoundly missed. Your light will shine on through your children, stepchildren, grandchildren, and life partner.

free WILL ASTROLOGY BY ROB BREZSNEY

ARIES (March 21-April 19): In your personal chart, the planet Uranus symbolizes those special talents you have that are especially useful to other people. Which aspects of your soulful beauty are potentially of greatest service to the world? How can you express your uniqueness in ways that activate your most profound generosity? If you learn the answers to these questions, you will make great progress toward solving the riddle that Uranus poses. I'm happy to report that the coming years will provide you with excellent opportunities to get to the bottom of this mystery. And now would be a good time to launch a concerted effort.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): In the coming weeks, I'm afraid there's only a very small chance that you'll be able to turn invisible at will, shapeshift into an animal form and back, or swipe the nectar of immortality from the gods. The odds of success are much higher, though, if you will attempt less ambitious tasks that are still pretty frisky and brazen. For example, you could germinate a potential masterpiece where nothing has ever grown. You could legally steal from the rich and give the spoils to the poor. And you could magically transform a long-stuck process that no one thought would ever get unstuck.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Are there any weaknesses or problems in your approach to communication? They will be exposed in the coming weeks. If you're even slightly lazy or devious about expressing yourself, you will have to deal with the karmic consequences of that shortcoming. If there's more manipulativeness than love in your quest for connection, you'll be compelled to do some soul-searching. That's the bad news, Gemini. The good news is that you will have far more power than usual to upgrade the way you exchange energy with others. In fact, this could be the time you enter into a golden age of communication.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): If you narrow your focus now, the world will really open up for you in the second half of October and November. To the degree that you impose limitations on your desire to forever flow in all directions, you will free up creative ideas that are currently buried. So summon up some tough-minded discipline, please. Refuse to let your moodiness play havoc with your productivity. Dip into your reserve supply of high-octane ambition so you will always have a sixth sense about exactly what's important and what's not.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): The state of Maine has a law that prohibits anyone from leaving an airplane while it is flying through the air. This seems like a reasonable restriction until you realize how badly it discriminates against skydivers. Legal scholars will tell you that examples like this are not at all rare. Laws tend to be crude, one-size-fits-all formulations. And as I'm sure you've discovered in your travels, Leo, one-size-fits-all formulations always squash expressions of individuality. In the coming weeks, be extra alert for pressures to conform to overly broad standards and sweeping generalizations. Rebel if necessary. You have license to be yourself to the tenth power.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): I propose that you try to accomplish the following clean-up projects in the next four weeks: ten bushels of weeds yanked out of your psychic landscape; 25 pounds of unused stuff and moldering junk hauled away from your home; 10 loads of dirty laundry (especially the metaphorical kind) washed free of taint and stains – and not blabbed about on social media; at least $5,000 worth of weird financial karma scrubbed away for good; a forgotten fence mended; and a festering wound tended to until it heals.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Philosopher William Irwin Thompson says that we humans are like flies creeping along the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. We literally cannot see the splendor that surrounds us. As a result, we don't live in reality. We're lost in our habitual perceptions, blinded by our favorite illusions, and addicted to beliefs that hide the true nature of the universe. That's the bad news, Libra. The good news is that every now and then, each of us slips into a grace period when it's possible to experience at least some of the glory we're normally cut off from. The veil opens, and previously undetected beauty appears. The weeks ahead will be the closest you've come to this breakthrough in a long time.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Can you guess which European country has the best military record in the last eight centuries? It's France. Out of the 185 battles its soldiers have engaged in, they've won 132 and lost only 43. Ten times they fought to a draw. Of all the signs of the zodiac, Scorpio, I think you have the best chance of compiling a comparable record in the next 10 months. Your warrior-like qualities will be at a peak; your instinct for achieving hard-fought victories may be the stuff of legends years from now. But please keep in mind what the ancient Chinese military strategist Sun Tzu said in his iconic text The Art of War: The smart and powerful warrior always avoids outright conflict if possible, and wins by using slyer means.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): After consulting the astrological omens, I've concluded that during the next three weeks, you will deserve the following titles: 1. Most Likely to Benefit from Serendipitous Adventures; 2. Most Likely to Exclaim "Aha!"; 3. Most Likely to Thrive While Wandering in Wild Frontiers and Exotic Locales; 4. Most Likely to Have a Wish Come True If This Wish Is Made in the Presence of a Falling Star. You might want to wait to fully embody that fourth title until the period between Aug. 9 and 14, when the Perseids meteor shower will be gracing the night skies with up to 170 streaks per hour. The peak flow will come on Aug. 12 and 13.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You may have to travel far and wide before you will fully appreciate a familiar resource whose beauty you're half-blind to. It's possible you'll have to suffer a partial loss of faith so as to attract experiences that will make your faith stronger than it ever was. And I'm guessing that you may need to slip outside your comfort zone for a while in order to learn what you need to know next about the arts of intimacy. These are tricky assignments, Capricorn. I suggest you welcome them without resentment.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): My daughter Zoe has been writing some fine poetry these last few years. I regard it as professional-grade stuff that has been born of natural talent and developed through discipline and hard work. You might ask, quite reasonably, whether my evaluation of her literary output is skewed by fatherly pride. I've considered that possibility. But recently, my opinion got unbiased corroboration when her school awarded her with the "All-College Honor" for her poetry manuscript. I predict you will soon have a comparable experience. Your views or theories will be confirmed by an independent and objective source.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): The critic Dorothy Parker didn't think highly of Katherine Hepburn's acting skills. "She runs the emotional gamut from A to B," said Parker. I realize that what I'm about to suggest may be controversial, but I'm hoping you will be Hepburn-like in the coming week, Pisces. This is not the right time, in my astrological opinion, for you to entertain a wide array of slippery, syrupy, succulent feelings. Nor would it be wise to tease out every last nuance of the beguiling vibes rising up within you. For the time being, you need to explore the pleasures of discerning perception and lucid analysis. Get lost in deep thought, not rampant passion.

Savage Love

WORDS OF PURE WISDOM by Dan Savage

I am a hetero female, but one of my biggest fantasies is for a guy to dress up in women's underwear. Not full-blown drag, just a teddy, fishnets, and some heels. He doesn't even have to act like a woman. I just want him to parade around a bit, and just for me. I've had the ovaries to bring this up only twice to men I've been with. My first boyfriend was game, but I was so insecure with my sexuality at the time that I let it go. My second boyfriend found it degrading and wouldn't do it. I think there are two things holding me back: (1) I've never even heard of this fantasy, and that makes me feel like a creep. Is there a name for it? (2) I know the first time I will giggle with joy and I'm afraid that will be a big buzzkill if my hypothetical future boyfriend thinks I'm laughing at him.

Lingerie Without A Man

1. There isn't a name for this fantasy, LWAM, so let's come up with one. How about "Frank-N-Furter-Ing," for Dr. Frank-N-Furter, a noted research scientist who also enjoyed dressing straight boys up in fishnets, teddies, and heels.

Your fantasy probably lacks a name because it isn't that odd or a whole lot to ask. And this fantasy makes you more sexually and romantically marketable than you seem to realize, LWAM. The world is full of men who aren't gay, aren't into drag, and aren't into full-blown crossdressing but who are turned on by the idea of wearing the girlfriend's panties and/or a little lingerie. A lot of these men are with women who barely tolerate their kinks. The single ones, on the other hand, are out there looking for a girlfriend who is turned on by the thought of a guy in panties, teddies, fishnets, and heels. Post a few explicit personal ads on online dating sites—kinkster and normster—and I promise you'll be flooded with responses from guys who want to put on a show for you.

2. It is permissible to giggle during sex. If you're worried that your partner might think you're laughing at him, qualify your giggles in advance. Explain that you're prone to joyous laughter when you're turned on and you might get a little giddy during his performance. Emphasize that your giggles are evidence of arousal, not disgust or contempt. Then prove it by fucking the shit out of him.

3. Have you checked out www.xdress.com? Think of it as your own personal porn stash before you find a boyfriend, and your favorite online shopping destination after.

I am a heterosexual female. My husband hates condoms. When we started being exclusive and monogamous, we were both fully screened for STDs and I went on the pill. That was four years ago. Since then, I have been through eight different versions of the pill. My current one gives me a two-week period, I have gained about 25 pounds in two months, and I am more moody. My doctor just prescribed me a new pill that will likely increase my weight and make me even moodier, but it should decrease the length of the period. I am sick of this! I think my husband should suck it up and wear a condom.

He is completely resistant. It is ironic that the pill protects me from pregnancy if I have sex, but we're having less sex due to the weight gain, bloating, bleeding, no sex drive, and other side effects. My doctor does not think other options for birth control (e.g., an intrauterine device) will be a good fit for me. Should I continue on the pill or tell my husband that if he wants sex, he has to share responsibility in avoiding pregnancy?

Tired Of Pills

Shared responsibility.

And you can keep having sex without pills, condoms, or pregnancies. There's oral (his-and-hers), anal (ditto), and mutual masturbation (underrated). But if it's vaginal intercourse he wants, then he'll have to get used to condoms. Some women can't take hormonal birth control, and your husband is married to one.

I was watching a porno featuring a hot gay threesome. Two tops double-penetrated a bottom. The odd part: The tops shared a single condom! I'm wondering how safe this might be. It certainly doesn't seem safe.

Dubious In Phoenix

It was safe for the bottom—provided that overtaxed condom didn't burst (here's hoping they were using a more spacious, more durable female condom)—but it wasn't safe for the tops. Jamming two dicks into a single condom could result in dick-to-dick transmission of a number of sexually transmitted infections—herpes, HPV, chlamydia, syphilis, gonorrhea, etc.

I am a 25-year-old straight woman. I recently started seeing a man. The first time I slept with him, he told me that he was interested in a relationship, and I told him that I wanted to keep things purely casual. Over the next month and a half of talking to him, hanging out, and having sex, I started to really like him. I was thinking about changing my mind and taking the relationship to the next level.

The last time I saw him was a week ago. He came over, we had sex, and then he mentioned he had met someone else. As he was beginning to elaborate, I told him to leave.

My anger comes from his timing. If he had told me this before we had sex, Dan, I would have been able to have a constructive conversation about this. The problem now, if I'm being completely honest with myself, is that I really like him and I don't want to stop seeing him.

A couple of questions: Do I reach out to him again? Did I overreact?

I can understand why you were upset. You had already taken things to the "next level" in your heart—you were thinking of this guy as your boyfriend—you just hadn't gotten around to informing him about the upgrade. And you assumed that, when you did get around to letting him know, he would be delighted. Because he was the one who wanted a relationship at the beginning, right?

Unfortunately, LITL, he took you at your word when you said you weren't interested in a relationship. Keeping things "purely casual" with you meant he was free to pursue a relationship with someone else.

I can't help but wonder what he was about to say when you told him to get out. He met someone else, which wasn't a violation of your rules. Did that mean things were over between you two (which would make the timing of the last fuck an insult)? Or was he willing to pass on this other girl if you were ready for a relationship (which would make tossing him out before he could elaborate a mistake)? You probably should've heard him out.

Go ahead and reach out. Let him know that you were thinking about taking things to the next level—ughers to that phrase—before he told you about the other girl. You were starting to fall for him, you hoped he felt the same, and you were disappointed. But since he was only doing what you asked—keeping it casual—you can't fault him for keeping his options open, looking around, dating other girls, etc. And you can't fault him for failing to read your mind.

Close by telling him that you'd be open to dating—a real, noncasual relationship—if things don't work out with this other girl.
